- iii. Write a summary of the following passage in about 100 words:

Animals are different, and each has different needs. For instance, Hedgehogs, who roll themselves into tight balls, can easily become injured if children try to “uncurl” them or if cats attack them. Sugar gliders are very social animals, and if they are not given enough attention, they may self-mutilate or die from the stress of loneliness. However, the exotic “pet” trade is big business which does not take into consideration these differences. For them, selling protected wildlife in stores, auctions, or on the Internet is one of the largest sources of criminal earnings. But the animals pay the price. Many don’t survive the journey from their homes, and those who do survive often suffer in captivity and die prematurely from malnutrition, loneliness, and an overwhelming stress of confinement, in an unnatural and uncomfortable environment.

Animals destined for the pet trade are yanked from their homes in places such as Australia, Africa, and Brazil and are subjected to grueling transport. Parrots may have their beaks and feet taped and be stuffed into plastic tubes that can easily be hidden in luggage. Stolen bird and reptile eggs are concealed in special vests so that couriers can bypass X-ray machines at airports. Baby turtles are trapped inside their shells with tape. Infant pythons are shipped in CD cases. Many of these animals die before reaching their destinations.

In the hands of unprepared or incompetent caretakers, many exotic animals die or are abandoned. Animal control authorities confiscated a crippled cougar cub from a basement in a house in New York. The animal, kept by a teenager, had been fed a diet deficient in calcium and, as a result, suffered from deformed legs. The head of the Environmental Crime Investigation unit in Western Cape, South Africa, estimates that 90 percent of exported animals die within a year.
